Ritsa Kyriacou, managing director of Cypria, says: 'The entire collection, stretching from the rare 19th century seascape of Jean Altamura to the contemporary abstract expressionism of Maria Hatzigaki is a visual guide to the evolution of Greek art in the 19th and 20th centuries'.

Cypriot art market

Marinos Vrachimis, marketing and sales director of Cypria, points to the recovery signs for the art market in Cyprus. He notes: 'After the downslide of the economy that shocked the art market we can finally say that we are on stable ground with art sales actually showing growth'. The art market in Cyprus had fallen victim to the financial crisis that hit the Mediterranean island's economy leading to weak sales and unprecedented low prices even in the case of exquisite artworks by pre-eminent artists.

Modern Art in Britain

Ritsa Kyriacou notes a marked increase in interest for Greek and Cypriot modernists by new art collectors in London. She says: 'It is our belief that present enthusiasm for modern art represents one of the positive indices of an emerging generation of art collectors in the UK'.

'In London, established collectors with an interest in Greek art have mostly invested in traditional Greek and Cypriot painting. Increased appreciation for the creativity, the underlying ideas and the subversiveness of significant Greek and Cypriot modernists marks a fascinating development'.

AUCTION HIGHLIGHTS

Jean Altamoura, The Port of Copenhagen

Painted in the years Jean Altamoura (1852 - 1878) lived in Denmark, The Port of Copenhagen (58 x 78 cm, oil on canvas) captures the metaphysical atmosphere of the Northern European seas with a marked shift towards the brightness of Greek light. Deeply mystical, The Port of Copenhagen is considered one of the most important works by the pre-impressionist Greek artist whose work had a direct and dramatic influence on the evolution of Greek art.

Alexis Akrihakis, Untitled

Untitled (85 x 116 x 17 cm, construction) is a fine example from a series of constructions of wood and fluorescent light by Alexis Akrihakis (1939-1994). The Greek artist experimented with the mysterious relation between art and experienced reality, theoretically and practically, stretching his exploration from artistic narrations preserving childlike innocence to colourful and fluorescent representations of hidden departure - the life that will be no more. Untitled was created by Akrihakis in his transitional years of the late 1970s.

Ioannis Kissonergis, Kreontas and Antigone

Kreontas and Antigone (82 x 122, oil on canvas) is a rare painting by Ioannis Kissonergis (1889-1963), one of the founding fathers of Cypriot art. He came under the influence of academic realism during his university years at the School of Fine Art in Athens. Kissonergis approached the painterly surface with rigidity, exceptional technique and care for details. Despite the shift from the idealized to the ordinary that dominated the realist movements, Kreontas and Antigone is inspired by classical mythology. This idealized work offers a glimpse into the artistic preferences of the urban elite in Cyprus during British colonialism. Most of Kissonergis' work is not dated, making Kreontas and Antigone particularly exceptional in that it bears the date 1925.

Gerassimos Steris, Homeric Seashore

Homeric Seashore (50 x 64 cm, oil on canvas) is one of the most representative paintings by modernist Gerassimos Steris (1898-1987). It belongs to the 1926-1936 decade in which Steris explored surrealism and the post-cubic influences of his Parisian years. An innovative and subversive artist, Steris introduced to Greek Art cubism together with the metaphysics of Giorgio de Chirico. His particular style and enigmatic paintings, full of challenge for the explorative viewer, captured the imagination of poet Odysseas Elytis prompting him to address the artist as the lucid and elusive Steris.

Victor Ioannides, The Old Market

The Old Market (55 x 64 cm, oil on board), a scene from old Limassol, is one of the finest works of Cypriot painter Victor Ioannides. An exceptionally skilled craftsman, Ioannides approached his canvas both as an impressionist and as a realist, painting scenes from every day life, landscapes, portraits, stills and nudes. The artist was captivated by light and always tried to capture its translucency and brightness. To achieve it, he experimented both with technique and materials. He made his own varnishes which he mixed with processed paints. At times he created relief surface bases from alabaster powder on canvas. Then he used the processed paints and varnishes, thus giving the painted surfaces porcelain like effect.

Katy Stephanides, Untitled

Untitled (80 x 105 cm, acrylic on canvas) is a unique painting by vanguard modernist Katy Phasouliotis Stephanides (1925 - 2012). It belongs to the artist's series of paintings under the general title Homeric (2005-2008). From her early sketches to op-art and from cubism to constructivism and abstract geometric painting Stephanides always approached painting through the difficult track. She continuously experimented with form, colour and materials. She alternated between representation and abstraction, both of which she regarded as a way to explore and unravel the hidden qualities of space. A leading modernist, Stephanides had a dramatic influence on art in Cyprus. In the Homeric series, the figurine functions both as compositional element and metaphysical allegory. In Untitled, large fields of radiant colour attune to the symbolism of the figurine together creating a novel sense of soft form and hidden space.
